▪ The Backbone of Agriculture

Farmers own the backbone of India's agricultural system. As it is common knowledge that the gross domestic product should be fair for a nation to develop, agriculture is one of the important components. Only if crops are cultivated and harvested, will the farming system work? So this is where farmers come in. They aid the growth of the agricultural sector, which not only feeds the local people but also provides the economy with the benefit of exporting the products to foreign countries.

▪ Prime Source of Food

As we need other professions in our life at a particular point in our lives, just like if we are sick, we go to a doctor, and when we need to learn skills, we need a tutor. These professions are vital to us, and life would be very difficult without them, but life without farmers would not be sustainable. Every day, we all need farmers. We need sufficient food for the development of a sound mind in a sound body.

▪ Selfless & Sense of Duty

While an individual in a corporate world might require rewards and frequent reminders to function efficiently, a farmer, on the other hand, would not require tremendous cash compensation for his labour. They only need the resources which are needed to grow crops such as fertilizers, seeds, and materials needed to cut crops during the harvest season. Farmers do not need much incentive to operate apart from these utilities. As they have enough sense of duty in their hearts to feed their own family and the whole world.
